Clean and classic, this white guest room is unique for its yesteryear details — a grandmother's silver brush set, two 1930s glass lamps, a monogrammed French bed sheet-turned-slipcover. "The room conjures up feelings of comfort and relaxation, which is perfect for a guest bedroom," Perez says.

It's a high-tech office that "I didn't even know I was getting," says a smiling Harry Hedaya, CEO of The Loan Corporation in Tampa. "It was all a conspiracy to have my office look more 'me.' And it truly is." With sleek, curving Italianate furnishings and cabinetry, the cockpit-style space — including glove-leather chairs complete with tray-table armrests — plays off Hedaya's love of flying jets. "I didn't know the design of an office could mean so much," he says. Tapped to make it happen was Tampa interior designer Debbie Clifton Perez, who collaborated with Hedaya's wife. It was his wife's French rococo desk he'd borrowed right after moving in to his new office space. "I thought I'd figure out what I really wanted to do with my office later," he says, but "later" had gone on too long. "Harry's at the helm of a successful company and needed an office that reflected that," Perez says. "I love that men are really getting into their work spaces now."
